PREFACE

A group of men who are engaged in the administration of religious affairs or the teaching of religion in universities and colleges met informally at the University of Chicago in January, 1940 to survey their common problems. Their discussion disclosed that the educators who are charged with responsibility for religious affairs within their respective institutions of higher learning have not created an association nor attempted a cooperative study of their own administration and educational functions.

The following persons agreed to make an introductory survey: Charles W. Gilkey, Dean of the Chapel, University of Chicago; M. Willard Lampe, Director of the School of Religion, State University of Iowa; Sidney Lovett, Chaplain, Yale University; Thornton W. Merriam, Chairman of the University Board of Religion, Northwestern University; and Edward W. Blakeman, Counselor in Religious Education, University of Michigan. This initial report is offered to show the extent of participation in religious education at the university level, state the problem in terms of persons employed and suggest issues needing further study.

The cooperation of many persons and institutions is essential to any attempt to bring together a considerable body of data of this type. Therefore, we greatly appreciate the response of the registrars and their colleagues who have assisted us. The advice of Registrar F. L. Kerr, University of Arkansas, was extremely valuable. We are indebted to Robert S. Waldrop, a graduate student at the University of Michigan, who read the proof.

SUPERVISION OF RELIGION IN

SECTION I

SUPERVISION OF RELIGION IN HIGHER EDUCATION

Religion at its best is a complete and satisfying integration. It involves personal commitment, ethical adjustment in society and an orientation to cosmic purpose or the inexorable forces beyond. It is the function of religion to carry along values which otherwise would be lost, to catch up new values and weave them into patterns of thought and behavior increasingly adequate to the individual and the group. Religious study or religion as a field of knowledge, grows out of a wide range of experience on the part of persons. When properly taught, religion as a study will explore every phase of man's racial experience, various aspects of our culture including the natural and social sciences, the arts and philosophies, as well as the homely influences of everyday living. The curriculum of a university can scarcely be considered complete until it includes religious education.

Many men in science, as well as in the arts, go beyond this position and ideally accord to religious education a unique function. At the University of Michigan, in 1940, following a brilliant lecture upon certain researches in varieties of human physique, delivered before a considerable gathering of faculty persons from the departments of psychology, anthropology, sociology and medicine, one of a Harvard group of scientists who now proposes to move toward the influence of constitutional variation on temperament, as well as on disease and crime, was asked, "What discipline, then, is it which aims to knit together or bind these several disciplines in the research on which you men are launching?" The speaker was William H. Sheldon.¹ He replied, "Religion or religious education should do so." Then, he added as if he had spoken out of turn, "Now, religious education, as we observe it in society, is without the necessary techniques for its task but synthesis is its unique challenge and continuing responsibility."

A study of the administration of religion at the university level is introduced in the belief that if we could bring a wide variety of scientists, historians, philosophers and others to desire a complete integration or an adequate joint ministry to the human soul and our needy society, the result would be an education in religion.¹ That is, the process by which a total university staff in the various disciplines arrived at a healed humanity would be one which we would recognize as successful religious education.²

This survey is attempted for the purpose of recording a university personnel in religion which thus far has never been specifically related to this outstanding religious task in our American life.

The Situation

In its practical aspects, the religion of students has been delegated to agencies beyond the campus. William C. Bower, of the University of Chicago, surveying the status of religious leadership within American institutions of higher learning in 1931, declared:

"We can hope for neither understanding nor appreciation on the part of the student until the college itself accords to religion the importance which its place in historical and contemporaneous culture demands. The college or university cannot delegate this function to any voluntary religious agencies operating under auspices of bodies external to the campus, however great a place it may offer to the contributions of such external agencies."³

That statement did not impress us as a new idea at the time and was not accepted as being in advance of general thinking in religion. However, the leaders of religious thought and the directors of religious activity will be quick to admit that we have spent ten years only to discover that even today we are far short of the goal which he described. Except for signs of advance here and there, religion in higher education is problematic if not sterile. During the ten years which have just elapsed, a School of Religion has come to maturity within the State University of Iowa. The Jew-Catholic-Protestant Religious Conference at the University of California at Los Angeles has become a model of Inter-Faith voluntary activity on a campus. A Degree Program in Religion and Ethics, binding fifty-four courses into an area of concentration at the University of Michigan, has suggested the method by which a state university may offer religion in its curriculum. Centers like Bucknell University in Pennsylvania, Cornell University in New York, Miami University in Ohio, in common with the older colleges of New England, have continued to offer well-integrated programs involving courses, church relation and voluntary devotional life; while universities similar to University of Chicago, Stanford University, Duke University and Princeton University effectively worship and offer interpretation through vast chapel programs.

Yet there is in existence no organization specifically designed to bring together the growing number of trained faculty leaders in religion. Though the Religious Education Association¹ has the necessary aim, a magazine and a commendable history in general religious education, it has failed to attract a university and college constituency. The campus chaplains, the professors of religion and the religious counselors employed by the institutions go their several separate ways. No learned society binds them in high creative effort. No systematic enterprise dealing with basic concepts and confronting the problems peculiar to religion as a discipline, forces them to grapple with the issues of mankind.² Those newly initiated into new positions look in vain for the fellowship, training and insight which might be provided by their forerunners. Except as the National Council for Religion in Higher Education builds its own fellows into a "Week of Work"³ there is in operation no central coordinating society of accepted merit. Fragmentation has come to be accepted as normal. Educational stagnation and religious provincialism may be expected to result unless joint effort of some creative value to these staff persons can be brought about.

One of the objects of this enumeration of the growing faculty staff in religion is to indicate the similarity of functions which different men perform and to challenge the persons so engaged to perfect the work in hand. Just now, when deep thinking and genuine fraternal participation in the problems of student youth are most needed, it might be wise to bring the administrators of institutions and the leaders of agencies together in a definite joint attack on the ethical and religious issues of our culture.

The Approach

The introductory stage of any survey is intriguing. In this one there were several problems to be settled as we searched for a simple method which would secure general response and call forth specific facts. The instrument would have to be one which would serve two very different types of institutions. The following will illustrate a single issue. Religion, philosophically, historically, socially, as well as theologically expressed, can be taught in the curricula, provided for in the budget, preached in the chapel and adopted as an educational goal in the independent universities and the church-related colleges. Hence, the survey questions might deal with worship, courses in Christianity, or the pastoral relation of given faculty members to the students. However, such a series might be answered by all registrars and yet fail to disclose how the spiritual development or the religious growth of students were regarded by staff and faculty members in the state universities and colleges.

In these institutions of state or civic origin, religion has not been readily accepted as indigenous to higher education. Though the separation of church and state was meant to prevent sectarian emphasis at the expense of the state and not to prevent religion from being pursued or taught as a phase of education, the difficulties of administration under such a fine distinction are many. As a result, many states have developed systems of public education, including colleges and universities, from which religion as a distinct subject has been omitted. As others would state the case, the full range of human learning is attempted with religion, as such, receiving only incidental reference.¹

Wiegler, "Public Education and Religion," Religious Education, XXXV (April-June, 1940), pp. 67-75.

How generally do the institutions of higher learning create faculty positions in religion or appoint staff members to administer religious affairs? That question became the major inquiry. The hope of securing prompt returns caused us to forego a thorough inquiry and adopt the personnel type of question. We chose three functions as germane and asked: (1) "Who within your university or college is responsible for the administering, conducting or coordinating of religious affairs?" (2) "Does the person who administers religion correlate the activities of religious leaders adjacent to the campus with the university or college program?" (3) "Who is the chairman in charge of university or college courses in religion or religious education?" The institutions listed by the American Council on Education¹ were accepted as the range of the study. The letters of inquiry were sent to the universities and colleges and not to extra-faculty religious agencies.²

The Response

Our initial questions to the 726 institutions brought replies promptly from 502 registrars. Two other letters raised the total number of respondents to 724. Long distance telephone calls to the two remaining institutions made the survey complete as to scope. Additional communication was sent to 417 institutions as a means of verification of a name or staff position.

Because of this splendid response, the large number of trained persons found to be engaged in this field, in all 1051, and the vast amount of factual information sent to us, it would seem accurate to assert as our initial discovery, that institutions of higher learning, regardless of educational purpose or foundation, are definitely interested in the spiritual aspirations of their students. If the survey succeeds in registering that interest, and in stating the institutional provisions which are being made at these centers in terms of university and college personnel, the effort will be rewarding.

The Administrative Function

These 726 institution studied vary in size from small, compact colleges, with a few hundred students and a small faculty, to vast universities, consisting of strong arts colleges, graduate and research divisions and ten or twelve professional colleges, plus extension systems and summer schools. Hence, administration methods in religious affairs vary widely.¹

Many different origins and purposes are represented, such as: to advance the general culture and add to the store of human knowledge, to perpetuate a given religious belief and discover talent for the ministry, to develop educated citizens, to complete the public educational system of a state or city, to offer training for given vocations, or for the purpose of conducting an educational experiment with a selected type of students. Diversity of religious administration results.¹

The nature of religion as expressed at the college and university level, likewise, makes for diversity of administration. Counselors and professors in the field of religion are confronted by an array of allegiances, many types of religious beliefs, various habits of family life, different indoctrinations, a wilderness of utopian longings, distinctive practices of worship, each important to the youthful adherent.² These will differ as to sections of the country served, the world conditions, the social and economic tensions and other factors. Therefore, the methods of administering religion--this sensitive relation to the ideal, to the world beyond and to others, will vary from campus to campus.³ Also, the scholarship essential, as well as the imagination and social skill required to cause ideals in any measure to satisfy, unify or refine the desires of alert students, must create for each institution its own peculiar series of problems in leadership and supervision.

Delayed standardization of function and a lag in the professional training of leaders in religion at the university level tend to complicate the problem. Perhaps, because religion in western society has been denominationally expressed, educational institutions in the effort to adhere strictly to a non-sectarian education have found it difficult to develop a consistent teaching schedule and strong activity programs in religion. A promising feature at this point, as brought to light by the survey, is the wholesome participation of the chairman of a wide variety of university departments in the religious aspiration and spiritual development of students, thus bringing many disciplines to bear.¹

The three aspects which we are surveying in terms of personnel seem to be variously defined and assigned to a wide range of officers. When, as indicated in these tables, professors in philosophy, history, literature and the natural sciences accept responsibility in this field, there may be an outlook for the functional development of religion within colleges and universities. Our data are insufficient to deal with this question further than to report a wide diversity of religious leadership within universities and to identify two lines of possible advance. First, a vigorous association of these educators in behalf of more effective procedures should be created. Second, a new discipline or profession, namely, that of the chaplain, religious counselor or university pastor is due or may be said to be emerging within the institutions of higher learning.²

There is a variety of control. Our survey is confined to those institutions listed by the American Council on Education, 726 in all, but if we should consider all the colleges, the institutional total would be 1,690 and the student enrollment 1,350,905. In 1938, there were 1,090 private institutions with 661,422 students and 600 public institutions with 687,483 students.³ The private institutions have found a central administration of religion feasible. But the public institutions, due to the theory of separation of Church and State, have met with difficulties as to religious courses and administration.⁴ Hence, a variety of administration of religion has resulted.

In Table II, the order or rank betrayed as to the distribution of staff positions is arrived at by a comparison of the frequencies of the different staff positions being assigned some one or more of the three functions, viz., administrator, correlator and chairman of instruction. We have given the three functions each the same weight. The ranking of positions is from the professors in religion (highest of the ten) to schools in affiliation (lowest in the list of positions). The positions here assigned, in the judgment of the surveyor, are in the proper order, though an index figure cannot be given because the number of institutions making returns for the three functions are not uniform and a few reports are inadequate.

Presidents and Deans

Much depends on the grasp of religion held by the members of an educational administration. The educator who will press the rights of religion and ethics in higher education as of equal value with other fields of knowledge in the arts college and as imperative in the professional colleges, will gradually win from his faculties an interest in religion. This leadership is being given today in several universities representing both state and independent institutions. Such administrators create a climate in which permanent courses and abiding movements may come to pass in their institutions. In such a climate the former trend toward technical training in preference to cultural discipline may be arrested. Thus, higher education may be turned in the direction of understanding, meaning, communication and value.¹

This does not depend upon any one discipline. The administrator who comes to his executive work from physics, political science, biology, business or law, may appraise our cultural needs and the means of meeting them, quite as readily as the administrator who has been developed through the classical or traditional studies of philosophy or religion.²

This survey asks about officers engaged in religion and religious affairs. Without distinguishing between persons technically trained or not trained in the field thought of as embracing "Religion," this study brings into relief those persons who stand at strategic posts. In higher education they now constitute the possible body of educators available to re-enforce the professional religious leaders who look to colleges and universities for significant interpretation and perhaps for direction.

The presidents in 100 of the 726 colleges and universities carry the administrative relation to religious affairs. In several other institutions, the vice president or an assistant to the president or some specific officer trained for the work and chosen to the staff of the president is the responsible person. The representatives of forty-two institutions responded to our inquiry with letters upon the subject. Of this number, half of them came from large state universities.

The deans of colleges other than religion, to the number of forty-eight, administer religious affairs. The administration of religious affairs in forty-one institutions is assigned to or shared by the office of the Dean of Students, Dean of Men or Dean of Women. If we combine with the deans of colleges other than religion, those who are deans of schools of religion, the total becomes fifty-eight, who administer religious affairs. If we include the deans of students with the two other classifications of deans, the total number of institutions in which a dean administers religious affairs is ninety-nine.

Professors

Professors of Religion, 156 in all, and ten Deans of Religion were reported as administrators. The predominant pattern is that of a person prepared as to content of the field, usually a trained class room man, being made the administrator. However, the fact that sixty-seven professors who are trained in some field other than religion have drawn appointments as administrators of religious affairs, or are asked to aid in this supervision, tends to suggest that interest and aptitudes have consideration. A further examination of the functions in given institutions and of the varieties of methods from campus to campus would constitute a promising field of study.

Chaplains and Counselors

Relatively few chaplains are charged with administration. There are thirty-nine who administer religion in as many institutions. The term seems to be in use only in those universities in which religious education is focused by means of preaching or central worship and where ecclesiastical appointments and architectural beauty have been anticipated.

Specific divisions of student personnel involving psychological, psychiatric and vocational testing, as well as personal and religious counseling, health examinations and academic adjustment, constitute a relatively young enterprise in American institutions of higher learning. Though the practice of guidance is as old as the church and the teaching art, the absence of definite, well-defined personnel practices within many of the institutions of higher education may account for the fact that only twelve institutions refer the duties of the administration of religion to counselors.¹ Counseling serves religion at such institutions as Northwestern University, Boston University, University of Michigan, Macalester College in Minnesota, Tufts College in Massachusetts, Canisius in the state of New York, Evansville in Indiana and Morningside in Iowa. Few persons who guide students in religion are known as counselors.

The terms Student Counselor, Spiritual Counselor and Counselor are used in a few Catholic colleges as applying specifically to the guidance and religious development. In universities in general, the terms counselor, clinician, academic counselor and personnel officer are used to apply to persons able to apply the techniques of educational, psychological, vocational and sociological measurement and attempt a therapy. Our questions were not designed to discover more than: do any such counselors draw staff assignment including an administrative relation to religious affairs?

The Christian Association Secretaries are called to officially administer or share in the supervision in the case of sixty-three such officers. These cases relate to but forty-one different institutions because in coeducational colleges both the young women's and the young men's secretaries are named. However, in the group tabulated as "Miscellaneous," the pattern frequently followed is that of the faculty-student "board."

In many of the sixty institutions to which we have referred as making use of "new patterns," the associations are important influences if not determining factors. Frequently, an "all-faiths," "faculty advisers" or "inter-faith" committee is given as the responsible administration group.

New Patterns

In many institutions experiments are in progress. The patterns and the terms which are used vary widely. Some of the groups, typical of educational centers, are those which have been evolved to carry administration or correlation by means of a democratic instrument. Among these are: the "University Religious Council" at the University of Wisconsin, the "Faculty Committee on Religious Activity" at Hamline University and Macalester College in Minnesota, the "Religious Council" at Oberlin College, "Student Religious Adviser" used at William Smith College of Geneva, New York and Saint Johns University in Brooklyn. "Director of Religious Activities" is the term used at North Carolina Woman's College of the University of North Carolina and twelve other institutions. "Committee," "Bureau," or "Director of Religious Life" is used at several centers.

At the University of California at Los Angeles, at the State University of Iowa, at Cornell University, at the University of Pennsylvania, at the University of Michigan and at several others in the survey, the "Inter-Faith" pattern has been developed. At Los Angeles, the University Religious Conference accommodates a large number of ecclesiastical units in a common building; Jews, Catholics and Protestants sharing responsibility for the total enterprise.

In twenty-two cases, the college or university names a pastor who is supervisor. In certain cases the community and the college seem to function as one. In fifteen cases, these same ministers also serve as professors of religion or Bible.

The Correlative Function

Grouped about the larger state and independent universities are various specific agencies of religious and social origin, primarily designed to encourage religious expression among students and to direct extra-curricula group effort of a specific type. Certain of these agencies are quite indigenous. The existence of these agencies, each intent upon a different interpretation of faith and practice and registering a degree of willingness to cooperate with the educational institutions but certain to shepherd a given flock in a definite manner, tends to complicate rather than simplify the problem of religious administration and correlation. This is a faculty problem.

Definition

Correlation, as here used, refers to educational adjustment of university or college program with the church guild and Christian association programs. Those who make an educational effort to guide university or college religious groups in their selection of goals or to adapt procedures and also to correlate the procedures of these groups, including their worship, discussions or voluntary studies, with the methods used by the agencies just off the campus in the community, are treated as performing this function.

In this report, the term religious agencies is used to embrace all religious organizations in the community, such as: local congregations, denomination boards, synodical or diocesan committees, religious guilds or nation-wide associations, leagues or foundations established to serve the students in their religious expression. These agencies are not officially related to the universities and colleges but are usually accorded a wide latitude of freedom among the students. The directors, secretaries and executives of such agencies usually are trained group leaders, especially prepared clergymen or religious educators, who have accepted the university or college constituency as a field of religious, socio-religious or educational influence.

Qualities of insight, leadership and skills of a high order are demanded of persons who perform the duties of correlating the activities of agencies, many of which are "off campus," with the campus programs of religious significance. It is apparent that a distinct discipline or profession is being developed as these university leaders systematize their work, create a literature and build patterns which are educationally and spiritually effective. Formerly, by far the larger share of these leaders were within the agencies. An increasing number year after year have become members of the educational institutions. Yet, around the 1051 enumerated in this study are as many others who continue their important work under the appointment of allied agencies.

Agencies

The chief agencies which go forward quite independent of the university or college but have been created specifically for the religious development of students, are: The Student Christian Associations, with the Student Christian Movement, a far-reaching enterprise, now three quarters of a century old, may be said to constitute the most comprehensive plans.¹

There is the Council of Church Boards of Education and the Conference of Church Workers in Universities, including the denominational foundations, Wesley, Westminster, Christian and others. These reach a large number of the educational centers.²

The Jewish organization, known as Hillel Foundation, supported by the B'nai B'rith, is active at many of the larger institutions from coast to coast.³

The Newman Club, which reports to the National Catholic Welfare Conference, is represented at a large number of the institutions in the survey.⁴

The National Conference of Jews and Christians is an organization aiming to relate the major religious and social traditions within cities and educational institutions.⁵

This survey, though confined to personnel in the field of religion and not designated to compare methods by which religious leadership, the conduct or worship or the development of churchmanship of students are advanced, points to the appraisal of various methods as an inviting problem.

Relatively few Christian Association Secretaries, forty-five, carry responsibility for the correlation of the campus and community programs in religion. The question was framed definitely to secure the names and to reveal the participation of faculty members rather than secretaries in independent agencies.

It should be observed that all persons in this survey are reported as being within the faculty personnel of the institutions. In many cases, the Association Secretaries, like the pastors and rectors referred to, are technically employed by an agency independent of the university or college. Evidently, in the cases here reported, these executive secretaries of Y.M.C.A. and Y.W.C.A. organizations, have been accorded either a fraternal relation or elected to the staff of the institution concerned. It should be reported also, that the Association philosophy and the Association secretarial training places the emphasis as to responsibility on the lay faculty or lay student member.

The report makes it evident that in many coeducational centers, the young men's and young women's associations themselves, or the practice of the Boards involved, are moving these agencies toward a Student Religious Association, thus putting the expressional work of the students on a coeducational basis, in coeducational institutions.

Shall modern higher education advance beyond an academic relation to the traditional faiths of Judaism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Christianity and Mohammedanism and carry on research in the objectives of religion and humanistic views? Shall each staff in religion master the modern theories of applied religion, weigh various utopian social proposals, examine the claims to salvations through cults, restudy religious education as a major discipline, explore the relation of faith to desire, and consider the whole area of values to be the field of religion?¹ Shall religion function in prophetic, as well as in priestly fashion and become increasingly dynamic as a social force in culture and accept the role of a coordinating social science among the disciplines?² Such is the inquiry suggested by the wide range of departments and professions dealing with religion in these institutions.

Should the university instruction group or the chairman of courses and his allies in other departments be expected to attempt an evaluation of the outcomes of courses in religion, lectures, worship practices, religious fellowship, sacred art, forums on ethical issues and works of faith or should such leaders adhere strictly to the established bodies of faith and practice? Our report on personnel suggests that if these eleven hundred educators could be "sparked" or touched off toward a study of motivation and the latent powers in our Judeo-Christian tradition, a new culture pattern could be brought about. A study beyond this one is suggested by the titles of the professors enumerated in these replies.

The reference to theological departments within or affiliated with institutions suggests the problem of religious education for undergraduates.³ Have the institutions and the religious bodies which originated the church-related institutions assumed that graduate courses in theology or religion weighted courses for a Bachelors in theology presumably of professional significance, perform a specific religious function for non-seminary youth? Have universities and their patrons overlooked the freshmen, sophomores, juniors and seniors in the arts college, and neglected a religious opportunity?

Shall religion be taught only in the colleges of liberal arts and not be offered for the students of education, law, engineering, medicine, pharmacy, commerce, agriculture, architecture, music, and so forth? Do the engineering, law and other professional students in the universities now secure a religious motivation by means of education? Since the endowments formerly built up to subsidize ministerial education cannot be used to meet the spiritual and ethical need of students in their arts courses, much less to introduce professional students to religion, what provision should be made for a serious approach to the religion of undergraduates and professional youth?

A few institutions, notably Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the College of Engineering at the University of Michigan and Case School of Applied Science have introduced projects of professional ethics. How rewarding these enterprises will be will depend upon the interest and versatility of the administrators, the response on the part of alumni active in their professions and the freedom accorded students in the engineering curriculum to turn to problems of ethics as a normal phase of their professional preparation.

A measurement of the attitudes, religious or otherwise, produced in courses in a college would be rewarding. What is the source of values? How advance the ethical sense? Our study, beginning in this survey of administration and personnel, while incompetent to provide such a measurement, records the list of men and women who are in positions to bring about the necessary cooperative research on such questions.

Likewise, by what means shall instruction, both as to content and as to method in this general field, be advanced? That is, how may the objectives of the courses now being provided be reviewed, the content enriched and the methods improved? The formal departments deal with this issue within their own skills but we are asking rather, how shall we attempt to increase the religious effectiveness of higher education? The data here recorded suggest the persons both within the specific discipline known as "Religion" or "Religious Education" and the persons without those disciplines, who are responsible. Hence, the findings here recorded stretch the vision, at least, as to how the range as well as the depth of religious education at the college and university level might be greatly increased.¹

The presidents of twenty-two colleges are also chairmen or share the duties of chairmanship of the curriculum in religion. No chairmanship might be expected to reside in every case with a professor in religion, Bible or religious education. However, of the 536 institutions reporting on this item, most of which offer courses in religion, only 288 such professors are chairmen of courses. Of these, fifty are designated "chairman," sixteen are Deans of Religion.

In eighty-five cases, a professor in a department other than that of religion teaches religion, Bible or religious education. These are chairmen in a few institutions involved.

Deans of various colleges to the number of thirty-seven teach courses in religion and eight Deans of Students, Dean of Men or Dean of Women meet classes in religion on a curricular basis.

Only one counselor in the entire list of 1051 officers combines teaching and counseling, though twelve counselors are administrators and nine have the duties of correlator.

In five cases, Association Secretaries of the Y.M.C.A. or Y.W.C.A. are staff teachers of religion and chairmen of the curriculum in religion.

The relation of pastors and rectors to the chairmanship of courses is not frequent. Of the 536 giving sufficient data, only fifteen pastors preside over the curriculum in religion, though twenty-two pastors or rectors are responsible for the administration of religion in as many institutions.

Areas of Concentration

The University of California at Berkeley in 1940 and the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor in 1936, provided for a degree program in religion and ethics as a convenient method of making available to students a series of courses in several different departments.¹

Schools in Affiliation

Twenty years ago, it was thought by many educators interested in religion at the college and university level, that the pattern of the independent college affiliated and located on adjoining land would offer the solution of religious education for many centers of higher learning. However, the study discloses that there are but four centers where affiliate staff members are chairmen of courses in religion.

The order of frequency of mention of departments is as follows: Religion, Bible, Religious Education, Philosophy, English, Psychology, Education, Social Science, A Natural Science, Library, others.

Apparent Trends

There are interesting features which might be grouped under the phrase, "patterns which tend to prevail." The functions of administration and correlation as brought out in the replies tend to fall to the same staff person or staff committee within an institution, while correlation and instruction chairmanship are seldom joined. Observe Table VI. It should be clear that the survey used "coordinate" in the first question with a view to applying that term to the duties of integration of instruction, activities and supervision within an institution. The term "correlation" was used in the second question to apply to the duties of relating the program within the institution to programs outside of the institution. Apparently the conduct of administration frequently carries with it the duties of both coordination and of correlation. However, in very few institutions, according to the results shown in Table VI, does the person who administers religion act as the chairman of instruction.

A comparison of the Handbook of Christian Education, (Wickey) with these preceding tables would complete the statement of fact and give a correct picture as to religious education involved, both institutions and agencies being considered. Table VII (pages 22 and 23) summarizes by states the response as to the three functions within institutions. Attention should be called to the fact that while it is gratifying to those interested in the religious leadership of students to find that over one thousand university and college staff members are so assigned, yet eighty institutions, eleven percent of the total, ignore the three functions treated in this survey, - naming men neither to administration, to correlation of programs nor to chairmanship of courses in religion.

Due to the diversity of pattern at institutions and the variation of response to the questions asked, the inclusion of certain reports has been impossible. Of the list of 1051 persons, 144 could not be included. Therefore, the figures here reported are tabulated to suggest a trend rather than to give a table of conclusions about the total number of staff persons reported.
